VOLCANIC PILLAR

you are going to be so unhappy over it. Let's forget about it, and gather some ferns, and you make lots." The ferns were soon gotten. She sat at his feet and commenced braiding the ferns, in a strand, and he held the end of her. They talked together as she worked, and almost before she realized it, she was telling him all about her father's plans to have her marry a young neighboring chief of high rank. Then she explained to him, how she had been betrothed to him when a very little girl. She hid her face in her hands, and said, "You will think I am nothing but a cry-baby, but I'm not," and she raised her head quickly.

"No, he can't have you, because you're my little girl."

"Yes, I am always just the little girl," she said, and then looked very puzzled. "But won't you please tell me what that word 'my' means, you always say it, but you have never told me what it meant?"

Jack smiled and said, "I will show you if you want me to." She nodded her head in consent. He then leaned forward and gathered her into his arms. She looked bewildered, and said:

"Oh, what a lovely word."

She then took off one of her bracelets, and gave it to him. She felt as though she must give him something. She then betrayed her people for her love of him, by telling him that the high pillar near the edge of the volcano was the object that pointed to their burial cave. She continued excitedly, because she realized what she was doing. "It is somewhere not very far from the edge on the west side."

Jack looked at her in surprise, and knew she realized what she had done for him, what those words had cost. So when he left her that day, she smiled bravely, with no sign of her real feeling.

It did not take Jack and Steve long to find the location. It was a deep cave, and to their joy they found a great many valuable articles, two beautiful feather cloaks, helmets, three hair necklaces, with the Palaua, which were family shrines to the Hawaiians, and hooks carved from bone, and a great many beautiful tapa cloths. All were arranged on piles of stones.

"Gad, what a lucky find!" Steve kept saying; "you worked it all right."

Jack did not like to hear him say this, because it would have been the last thing he would have ever asked her to tell him.

They decided to come a few nights later and carry away the treasures. On returning from the cave, they saw an old Hawaiian man, sitting near the pillar, and watching them as they approached. They exchanged greetings with him, and then passed on. They both wondered if he suspected man was a priest, and knew the bar-then, but decided that he didn't. It happened, though, that the old man came from the direction in which they came from. He was suspicious of them, and reported it to the chief, and he decided to have them watched.

The next day Jack finished a picture he had painted of the crater, and the day after they both went to the cave, and packed everything in two large bags, and then waited for the darkness of night to hide their proceedings. It came at last, and they journeyed into the night. Nothing was stirring, and the noise they could hear was the roaring of the volcano, as the lava swirled and dashed against the wall of the pit. They had walked about a mile, when they were suddenly brought to a halt by a group of natives, who appeared so quickly, that they seemed to have dropped in front of them from the sky.

"Well, we are goners now," they both thought.

Jack asked them what they wanted, and they told him the chief commanded their presence before him.

They both immediately saw the gravity of their situation and that there was no escape from this crowd, so decided to go on, as there was nothing else to do.

Thus their whole scheme was destroyed, and they were both commanded to be put to death the next day, by the chief. The Hawaiians were so strict in having their burial caves kept secret, that when a chief was buried, the men that carried him, or took some part in the procession, were killed afterward.

Both Jack and Steve looked at each other in amazement, when they heard the sentence. Jack thought of Keoian immediately. If she only knew about it, he thought she might be able to save them. But there was no way of letting her know.

The little village was in confusion and excitement over the event, and it luckily happened that Keoian overheard two of the high priests discussing the deed. She knew in an instant it was Jack and his friend.

What could she do? She was so frightened over it all, and felt as though she were to blame for it, because they probably never would have found the cave, if she had not told Jack where it was. Yes, she must do something, and do it soon, in order to save them. She thought of the picture Jack had given her, and remembered how impossible it looked to her at first. Couldn't she work on her father's superstition, by showing it to him to explain what wonderful people they were? Her mind was made up in an instant. She got the picture, which she kept hidden between the mats of her hiki or little bed, and went to her father's hut. She was refused admittance at first, but when she told them she had important news of the white men, she was given admittance immediately. She then told him that they were white gods of wonderful powers, and showed him the picture. He and his attendant looked at it in wonder and fear, as she knew they would. She then explained that if they killed them, their people would be destroyed by their spirits. They were so terrified at this news and so superstitious that the chief uttered thanks in prayer to the gods, for sending her to them with this news. He was a wise fellow, and said that she should be married the next day, because she possessed such great wisdom, and the white men could go free, but would have to return to their own country. She knew her fate was sealed by these words, but she bore them bravely, because she had saved his life, which would always mean more to her than anything else. Yet, she could bear it all for his sake, because she was confident that she could never be anything more than his little girl to him.

The next evening, just before sundown, Jack heard the paddling of several canoes out on the little bay, and he knew one of them was carrying away his little Keoian forever, who had sacrificed her happiness for him. All he carried away with him, besides his memory of his little girl, was the bracelet she had given him.

A Wonderful Crib—"The Taylor Nursery"

By placing it over the mother's bed, she has only to sit up, and can attend to the baby without taking it from the nursery bed. During the day the crib is out of the way. If she prefers, it can be placed alongside her bed—raised or lowered to any height. It's light in construction, and can easily be taken to any part of the house.

THE SAFETY HOOD

Is the most satisfying and perfect safety device ever known. A restless baby can't, in any manner, get out. Another feature is the large enough to hold all articles needed in the night. Everything for mother's and baby's comfort has been included in the building of "The Taylor Nursery."

OUR GUARANTEE

If any "Taylor Nursery" is not exactly as represented, in every particular, you may send it back five days after receiving it, at our expense, and we will promptly refund your money. Be sure each crib bears this trademark.
